509th helm changes, still ‘airborne all the way’

May 31, 2013

FORT POLK, La. — The day was filled with pomp and circumstance as the 1st Battalion (Airborne), 509th Infantry Regiment change of command was held May 31 at Fort Polk’s 1st Maneuver Enhancement Brigade field.

Lt. Col. Scott Himes, outgoing commander, relinquished command to Lt. Col. Matthew Tackett, as this legendary band of brothers — who have time and again shown their mettle from the dawn of World War II to the present — looked on. Soldiers of the 509th serve as the opposing force at Joint Readiness Training Center rotations.

Col. Willard M. Burleson, commander, JRTC Operations Group, told the attendees that the “Geronimo” Family and paratroopers in front of them represent the only separate airborne battalion in the United States Army.

“I can tell you that they are representative of those paratroopers who jumped behind enemy lines in WWII, fought bravely in small groups and wrought havoc in the European theater, as well as North Africa.

Col. Willard M. Burleson, commander, Joint Readiness Training Center Operations Group, passes the colors to incoming commander Lt. Col. Matthew Tackett at the 1st Battalion (Airborne), 509th Infantry Regiment change of command ceremony held May 31 at Fort Polk’s 1st Maneuver Enhancement Brigade field.

“The men and women gathered before you are some of the finest Soldiers in the Army at small unit tactics, field craft and small unit leadership,” said Burleson.

He congratulated the outgoing commander for the many accomplishments of his tenure and told Himes that his leadership had made a difference

“In the time that Lieutenant Colonel Himes has led the 509th, 20 brigade combat teams have come through Fort Polk for training, 19 of which were on their way to combat. That equates to 120 battalions or squadrons and 600 company batteries and troops. “The battalion before you has played an instrumental role in replicating Afghan nationals and security forces, as well as a very dangerous, lethal and adaptable enemy threat,” said Burleson.

Tackett thanked those in attendance, but his main focus was the Geronimo battalion. “I’m honored to be serving with such an historically distinguished battalion that has one of the most unique missions in the Army.

“I look forward to continuing the incredibly high standards you and all the honored veterans that have come before have established,” said Tackett.
